the mothering-love she had been craving, she'd been looking for someone, any motherly figure at all. She got that. In the very moment where she loved her mom was the moment where she found the word. I was in the midst of the middle of a major breakup when I got my calling. My friend had been seeing a therapist to work through the shit with her and get her back together with her ex-boyfriend. I was inspired by her enthusiasm for the idea of breaking up with someone, in order to be free to meet and build a new relationship with someone else. She was practicing the friendliest attitude she could towards a person that she didn't want to be with. I was inspired by this. I was like, I want to be like that. Have you ever felt angry at yourself for not being the friend that you want to be? Have you ever been frustrated with yourself, where you know that you're a good person who wants to be helpful, but nothing you've done has helped that person? Maybe you don't even know what would help that person. When you feel this way, and when you're overwhelmed with all these complex feelings and emotions that you don't know how to process, the friend that you want to be can be the friend who says, "I'm sad, too. I don't know what to say. Just listen." We all have to go through the process of figuring ourselves out. Some people will need some time, some people will need more time than others. Some people will need an intervention, some people will need to be left alone. It's that communication to each other, when we realize that we need to figure things out as a community, where we understand that we're all going through a process, and that none of us know everything and none of us know when it's going to end. Be there for one another, and don't be afraid to cry, don't be afraid to make mistakes. Be gentle, because we're all trying to figure this thing out, and we're all fragile and full of emotions. That's what we're going through as people.Q: how to use a TreeMap to get the key and values I want to create a TreeMap with different objects

The present invention relates generally to the field of atrial fibrillation. In particular, the invention provides a method and system for analyzing the electrophysiological mechanism for arrhythmic conditions. Atrial fibrillation is a common cardiac arrhythmia that results in substantial morbidity and mortality. It is estimated that over two million people in the United States have atrial fibrillation. Atrial fibrillation causes a significant reduction in cardiac output and can result in a stroke or a transient ischemic attack. Left untreated, atrial fibrillation can lead to congestive heart failure, systemic embolization and death. Atrial fibrillation is typically diagnosed based on patient history and physical examination. A commonly used classifier for atrial fibrillation is the ratio of the longest R-R intervals during sinus rhythm divided by the shortest R-R intervals during atrial fibrillation. The Atrial Fibrillation Severity Index (AFSI) is another index that classifies patients according to the severity of atrial fibrillation. When the AFSI is over 3, the patient has paroxysmal atrial fibrillation, and when it is above 8, the patient has persistent atrial fibrillation. A number of ablation treatments have been proposed for atrial fibrillation. One such treatment involves the creation of a complete ablation line across the atrial wall. While such a procedure can be effective in treating atrial fibrillation, there are a number of drawbacks. For instance, creating a complete ablation line across the atrial wall can be difficult.Q: How to find the position of a (unknown) character inside a string?
